shape" as the brochure goes. There is also, if you're willing to go that one step further, Smart Lipo, a procedure which, according to Dr Steven Victor of the Diamond Medispa at Daniel Galvin, puts everything else firmly in the shade. "Titan, Thermage... The maximum clinical improvement you're going to get is 25 per cent," shrugs Victor - a smooth-talking, silver-haired New Yorker who tells me he was the inspiration for the Park Avenue dermat in Plum Sykes's novel Bergdorf Blondes and used to be the consulting dermatologist for Elizabeth Arden and Clarins - "and unfortunately when you look in the mirror you aren't going to see that. To see a difference

"Smart Lipo targets exactly where you want and the effect is amazing: just like the way a rasher of bacon shrinks when cooked"

The next morning therefore, emboldened by the fact that IPL is one of the few non-invasive treatments Steven Victor (who will be opening his own London clinic shortly) doesn't pooch-pooch, I book an appointment.

Marty, Victor's right-hand woman and a trained nurse from North Carolina, recommends a salt microdermabrasion first so the skin is in prime condition to, as it were, accept the light. She then applies an aloe-vera gel and promises me we'll start out low.
